It did to Kleinman. "You start Friday," he told Haidos.

"No, I start Monday. Then you check up on me and see if I'm qualified. If you like my work, and if I like working for you, we'll work out the details."

That was 25 years ago, and Haidos is still working for the company, which Bob's son, R.J. (Buzz) Kleinman, now runs. He said of Haidos, "He takes care of the place as if he owned the property." On one point, Kleinman's memory differed from Haidos', and Kleinman said, "He's probably right. His memory's better than mine on those kinds of details."

Haidos is also right about plants, he said. His firm is well complimented on the flower beds Haidos keeps.

Della Haidos died in 1986 of Alzheimer's disease. With the help of a nurse, he tended her at home until the end, his family and friends report. As much as he likes to tell stories, it's hard for him to talk about her. "Some things, you know, some things they're sad. I don't like to tell sad stories."
